The Crisis Passed in Safety.

The Mason tax bill lies on the table of the Senate—under the quieting influence of parliamentary chloroform. If time be allowed it may be revived and put upor its feet. Without time it is dead beyond

Better still the House of Delegates ha refused to pass the resolution to extend the session. The Republicans planted themselves a lion in the path, and the taxeating enemy couldn't get by. Unless some remarkable change shall take place the Legislature will adjourn on Friday. There is no probability that the Republicans will change front. Moved by the highest consideration of the public welfare, they have taken their stand. They have declared that the Mason tax bill shall not pass with their assistance. They know it cannot pass without an extension of the Therefore they refuse to extend and there is no chance at this time to set the Wall street taxing machine in opera-In the light of this signal failure to put through its pet measure the censurable folly of the majority becomes very apparent. After the greater part of the session had been wasted, and the appropriation bills still unpassed, the valuable time remaining has been thrown away in an unsuccessful effort to extend the session that the Mason tax bill may have one more chance. The substantial unanimity with which the Democrats have acted on the proposition to extend indicates that they ould pass the tax bill if they had time. No act that could be passed, however meritorious it might be, could compensate for the passage of so iniquitous a measure as the tax scheme which the gallant Republican minority has defeated.

The crisis of the session has been dealt with successfully; the ship of state has been steered in safety past the rocks, and the hand of the minority was on the helm. lety Under the Next Administration.

Washington society is fast adjusting itself to the new conditions of "Jeffer sonian simplicity" soon to be imposed upon it by the Paritan spirit of reform which has seized upon the Democratic party. By way of example, a Washing-ton letter gives us a picture of the daughter of a distinguished Senator who will probably be the Prime Minister of the Administration of the Jeffersonian renais-

Miss Bayard was the sensation of the evening in a dress of the First Empire, copied from a portrait of one of the ladies of the Empress Josephine's court. Miss Bayard is a slender, gracelul girl, with a deal of animation and spirit, but always rather theatrical and astonishing in her dress, and the scant, clinging skirt of pink cashmere open at one side as high as the knee, and the narrow waist, which was a mere belt covered with pearl embrodery, was rather the furthest that anyone has gone in realistic costuping. After seeing the costume copied carefully from a painting one can understand why more women died of consumption during and just after the First Empire than at any other time in the history of France. She carried an immense fan of white feathers, and until the mystery was solved there were exstery was solved there were ex-I persistent groups about her. I first an open question whether he First Empire spoken of is that of fadagascar, the Sandwich Islands or Matagascar, the Sandwich Hands of the cierk found a tresh rat skill turned be Booriobooriagh. Further on all doubt is removed, and we see that the delicate reference is to a people the gayest of the gay, at a time when politics contended but feebly with fashion for the mastery and was knocked out in the first round. But the France of the First Empire is not the France of to-day. The climate has Feathers are always graceful and warming. When they are fine they make fine birds.

The costume above described was probably intended as a mere sketch-a bare suggestion—of what the fashionable young woman is expected to wear under the next administration. And so it ceases to be a "trifle light as air" and takes high place as a matter of great contemporaneons interest. The close and philosophical student of history will tell you the character of the reign of any king, prince or potentate if you tell him what style of dress was worn by the ladies of the court.

How Proof Reading Sounds,

Dos Molacs Revises.

Some writer has produced a poem called "Sounds from the Sanetum." It reads just too pretty, and gives readers the thought that the author never visited the sanetum when business was in fall blast. If he had called about midnight, for instance, he would have seen two saints one poring over a proof slip, the other holding the copy, and the sounds would have been something like this:

"Proof reader—As flowers without the sunshine fair—comma—so—comma—without you—comma—do I—full stop—breathe a dark and dismal mair—educate a man, but, when you educate a girl, you are laying the foundation for the education of a family. "He might have added that to this end the physical training was of equal importance to the mental. In these days the subject of the physical training or young men is occupying much attention, and the discussions are broad and full of interest. The fault is, that the needs of both sexes in this respect are not equally considered.

An creet figure, an organism in which the processes of life may so on without the ceaseless discord of functions at war with each other because of abnormal relationin short, the added advantages which a fine physical adjustment gives to its possessor—are as necessary to one sax as to the other, and for the same reasons.

If physical education and consequent improvement are things to be desired, it is not that a number of individuals as a result of this training shall be able to perform certain feats of strength and agility but in its broadest sense it is for the improvement of the race, and the race cannot materially advance physically, intollectually, or morally unless the two factors which constitute the race share equally in whatever tends to its greater perfection. Therefore, if in consequency of proper physical training men can do more work, live longer, and transmit to their offspring a share of this improved condition, women also should be so trained that they can do more work, live longer, and transmit to their offspring by supplementing instead of thwarting the promise which has been presupposed in the highest possibilities of their offspring by supplementing instead of thwarting the promise which has been presupposed in the highest development of the male parent.

Banger Commercial.

A party of Banger men went out fishing a short time since and one of them to protect his eyes were blue glasses. On arriving at the scene of the fishing the horse was stabled and the man with the blue glasses was detailed to give the animal a feed of hay. He went to do this and after being absent a half hour or more returned being absent a half hour or more returned and reported that there was no hay in the

"Why," said one of the party, "there are tons of it there."

"You are mistaken," said the young man who wore blue glasses; "there is nothing there except straw."

The party examined the stable and found hay in abundance.

The laugh was on the young man who wore glasses.

Philadelphia's Latest Crose.

The two charming English ladies who have come over as head nurses of Blockley have set the girls wild. They flock with wild enthusiasm to hear the lectures of Dr. White, and the scramble for tickets makes the excitement over "Assembly" tickets tame and uninteresting. The dear creatures find it just a trille steep now and then, but they pack the amphibiteatre and just dote over the stalwart subjects that Dr. White uses for his demonstrations. It is glorious to think that the nurse craze may last long enough to make the next generation of wives and mothers quite a knowing lot of nurses.

A Tragedy of an Empty Drawer,

This young person, destined in all probability to form an attractive figure in the official society of the new regime, had the good sense, rare in one so young, to protect herself against the rude blasts of winter with "an immense feather fan."

Feathers are always graceful and warming, all of which have been removed therefrom and are now treasured as mementoes of and are now treasured as mementoes of the expedition by those so fortunate as to have secured them.

He was from Boston, and had told her that Boston set the pattern in almost everything for all other cities in the Union.

"To change the subject," he said, "isn't it strange that of all the infernal machines sent to people nowadays not one ever goes off?"

She suppressed a yawn and replied:

"They probably follow the pattern of Boston young men."

He went off as soon as he could get into his overcoat and hat.
